crack file to activate this game,like zambomba.exe Resistance of refractory iron-deficiency anaemia to iron therapy. Clinical practice can be frustrating, as a number of well-designed studies have shown that iron deficiency is one of the commonest disorders in primary care, and yet only a relatively small proportion of cases of iron deficiency are responsive to oral iron therapy. In our series, up to 80% of patients with refractory iron deficiency anaemia had been treated with an insufficient dose of iron. Despite this, we found that hypochromic haemolytic anaemia can be improved by the institution of a low dosage of iron therapy. The transferrin saturation, however, improved only in about 50% of cases, but such an improvement usually lasted only a few days. The lack of response to iron therapy in a majority of cases of refractory iron deficiency anaemia is probably due to the presence of some abnormality in the iron absorption process. It is not clear whether serum ferritin can be used to predict the response to iron therapy.Paul Chohot III
